IFW 2024 is hosted by the Asian Food and Feed Insect Association (AFFIA). The execution of the event is supported by a Local Organizing Committee that includes prominent researchers, executives of leading insect ventures and local government representatives.

Singapore is an emerging hub of the insects as feed and food industry in addition to being a globally renowned center of research and innovation. Singapore is home to the National University of Singapore, widely recognized as the top research university in Asia, and a number of public and private high-tech research centers. These resources, as well as forward-thinking regulations are increasingly focused on innovations in urban agriculture, circular-economy and alternative proteins. Southeast Asia more broadly is home to a vibrant research community, a rapidly growing private sector and, of course, a rich history of insect consumption!

As a major travel hub, Singapore is easy to reach and its visa policies are very welcoming: the vast majority of countries do not require a visa to enter Singapore and those who do are guaranteed an answer within 2 working days of submitting applications.
